Bond fund flows signal shift

Money pours into emerging market debt

Risk fears hit several European countries

By Sarah Wigglesworth
in London

Money is continuing to pour into emerging market bond funds, adding to the cost of borrowing for developing countries and underlining the shift in economic power away from the western heavyweight of the financial system. Right now, emerging market debt is not only the most popular investment in these funds this year, it is also the most popular, according to the fund data provider.

This has reduced the yield on emerging market dollar-denominated sovereign and corporate debt to 5.61 per cent on average, from 6.14 per cent a year ago, at a time when aggregate global yields have edged up, according to calculations by Barclays Capital for the Financial Times.

Indonesia's 10-year bond, for example, yields 4.7

per cent, less than similar securities euro-denominated debt of a similar maturity. Brazil's 10-year government bond is trading at a similar yield to the 10-year US Treasury note, but its risk premium as the developed world has

The credit default swap index for 18 major emerging market countries has fallen by a third to 200, while the 10-year US Treasury note has climbed to almost 190.

"Emerging market debt is no longer a niche," says David Lunn, head of emerging market debt at Pictet, the asset manager, said. "It's losing its risk premium as the developed world has climbed to almost 190. "Emerging market debt is no longer a niche," says David Lunn, head of emerging market debt at Pictet, the asset manager, said. "It's losing its risk premium as the developed world has shot itself in the foot." "Fundamentally, emerging markets are just less leveraged, and thus more able to repay their loans."

Robust inflows into emerging market bonds stand in contrast to movements over potentially overvalued equity markets in developed countries.

Investors have pulled $15.8bn out of European bond funds this year, and more than $7bn was withdrawn from global equity funds last week, of which $1.6bn came from emerging market equity funds, according to BNP.

This selling has pushed MSCI's benchmark Emerging Markets Index down 1 per cent so far this year, while bonds sold by governments and companies in developing countries have largely held firm.

Analysts have voiced concern over the scale of the outflows into emerging markets. Equity markets have attracted the most attention, but some say borrowing costs are being pushed too low given the risks.

It's full steam ahead for Citi skipper

News analysis

It was anything but plain sailing after Vikram Pandit took on the Titanic, but now he has landed a $22m package, writes Justin Bacr

Vikram Pandit spent most of his first two years after being named Citigroup chief executive in 2007 defying expectations that his days at the US bank were numbered as it came perilously close to collapse during the financial crisis.

But last week, as Citigroup's stock, which had been repeatedly hammered by the crisis, fell to a low of $45, Pandit was rewarded with a $22m package of restricted shares, deferred cash stock options and an unusual statement by Citigroup's board that Mr Pandit had been repeatedly awarded the "highest" rating for his performance.

Japanese companies seek to take a bite of foreign growth

News analysis

Moves prompted by weak domestic economy, strong yen and low interest rates, says Lindsay Whipp

In the world of mergers and acquisitions, Japan has rarely been a shining example of bold moves.

But last week's combination of European acquisitions by Toyota and Toshiba raises the prospect of Japanese companies taking advantage of the strong yen and low interest rates to buy overseas growth.

falling prices for most of the past decade. But the rebound acquisition numbers, which this year have reached a record $147bn, according to Dealogic, suggest companies are beginning to work more deals outside Japan.

Tokai and Toshiba initiated talks with their respective targets - Nissan and Toshiba - before the disaster, suggesting that for many companies the tragedy has not prompted management to abandon or postpone long-term overseas expansion plans. It has probably compounded the need to diversify following the global financial crisis, one banker says.

While last week's deal represented a marked increase in size on the total deal involving Japanese buyers, it is not unusual for larger deals to overshadow a plethora of smaller ones. So far this year there have been a total of seven agreed Japanese deals worth more than $100m, including Toyota and Toshiba, and 233 deals worth a combined $1.2bn, according to Dealogic.

Some bankers argue that the deal is partly because so many domestic industries remain fragmented, reducing the probability that they could be acquired overseas.

Others say there is a new drive to consolidate in many sectors. A merger between Nissan Steel and Sumitomo Metal in February raised hopes that more could follow - but this is yet to happen.

Bankers also point out that unlike in Europe and North America, where companies in Japan are unlikely to reward management franchisees, they rarely own shares in the businesses they manage.

Mr Iwasawa is unequivocal about his lack of interest in pursuing a domestic acquisition strategy, because of the need to make redundancies at the acquired company to create value for shareholders. The target company's employees could believe they would be "second-class citizens" being absorbed into a much bigger company, explains Mr Iwasawa.

"If I need to spend my energy as a top executive of a company, I'd rather spend my time on a more rewarding opportunity [overseas] in terms of return on investment," he says.

Murdoch signals push into education

News Corp chief in digital lessons move

Vision for learning outlined in G8 talk

By Tim Brashers in Paris

Rupert Murdoch signalled that News Corp, the media group he heads, is to make a significant new push into the education technology market, in a high-profile speech to the G8 conference of internet entrepreneurs and European policymakers in Paris.

Describing education as the "last holdout from the digital revolution", Mr Murdoch outlined a vision for personalised learning and more engaging lessons delivered by the world's best teachers to thousands of students via the internet. "The same technology that transformed every other aspect of modern life can transform education, provide our businesses with the talent they need to thrive, and give hundreds of millions of young people at the fringes of prosperity the opportunity to make their own mark on this global economy," he said.

"The technologies that transformed every other aspect of life can transform education"

With Joel Kline, the former New York schools chancellor hired by News Corp in November, Mr Murdoch has visited pioneering educational schemes and classrooms worldwide, including South Korea, California and Sweden. "Our challenge is to learn from what works best - wherever it is - and put it all together," he said. "My company is determined to try - in a big way."

This determination will see News Corp set a collision course with more established education publishers such as Pearson, owner of the FT, and McGraw-Hill. Such companies have already invested heavily in digitising their materials and moving to more personalised learning and assessment, a theme of Mr Murdoch's assertion that "today's classroom looks a lot like the Victorian age".

News Corp first indicated that it was taking the education technology market more seriously in November with the acquisition of 80 per cent of Winston Goss, a New York company that tracks student performance through mobile devices and assesses most software, for $300m.

It indicated then that further acquisitions would follow, even as it plans to spend $50m or more on the acquisition of the 41 per cent of British Sky Broadcasting it does not own.

In an impassioned address to delegates at the G8 Forum, headed by Nicolas Sarkozy, the French president, ahead of the G8 later this week, Mr Murdoch called on the assembled technology executives to do for education what they have already done for the media and advertising world.

"Now we need to... make mainstream activity, to micro-target the right-age kids who might want to be doctors and to personalise the reading for each student," he said. "To engage young people in new ways, the key is the software, not a new device."

Fast food: FreshDirect is planning to expand after better technology helped it become profitable

Online grocers gain ground in US

US online grocers

Doubts remain about expanding beyond cities into the suburbs, writes Alan Rapaport

The online grocery business was hailed a doomsday bust a decade ago, when venture capitalists backed startups on the assumption that the weight of embolus expansion plans. But Walman's recent report into the market shows how the business of food delivery has progressed during the past 10 years, adding that the industry has been looking to expand to the suburbs and beyond.

With Joel Kline, the former New York schools chancellor hired by News Corp in November, Mr Murdoch has visited pioneering educational schemes and classrooms worldwide, including South Korea, California and Sweden. "Our challenge is to learn from what works best - wherever it is - and put it all together," he said. "My company is determined to try - in a big way."

after early missteps, has gradually expanded its footprint in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. An early participant in online grocery, FreshDirect, which sources food from farms to shorten the time between growing and delivering - initially faced problems with quality control and struggled to get orders correct. Better technology helped the company become profitable and, with 20 per cent growth last year, it is planning a national expansion.

"There are going to be lots of people focused on getting this model right," says Jason Ackerman, founder and chief executive of FreshDirect. "That's why we've been slow to roll out across the country because we have been so focused on how to get this model right."

Increased competition for key markets was highlighted in March when Peapod, a FreshDirect rival that was founded in 1998, made its debut in New York City. Peapod works with brick-and-mortar chains such as Stop & Shop and Giant and now serves 11 states in the Northeast. According to Peapod, online food shopping is more feasible now than it once was because of greater broadband access and the spread of smartphones, which has made buying even more convenient. Although the concept of buying food online is gaining acceptance, critics still doubt that significant numbers of customers will choose to buy food without seeing and touching it first.

Walman's online pilot in San Jose, California, follows a similar experiment by Amazon, which sells groceries in some parts of the Seattle area. Meanwhile, US grocery chains such as convenience stores and competitors such as Ocado and Tesco. Although the concept of buying food online is gaining acceptance, critics still doubt that significant numbers of customers will choose to buy food without seeing and touching it first.

writing to pay for delivery. Even Dalton Phillips, Morrison's chief executive, acknowledges the challenges online grocery faces outside of urban centres. He predicts that areas suffering from low density of customers will struggle to generate sufficient return on capital. "It's not a one-size-fits-all model in its current guise," he says.

However, one factor supporting the online grocery market is the boom in e-commerce. The National Grocers Association estimates that online grocery represents just 1 to 2 per cent of the $1,000 food market in the US. "Obviously there was a lot of a false start 10 years ago, when people thought the traditional grocery store was going to go away," says Peter Larkin, head of the NGA. "I think as technology and access to broadband have improved, the future of online grocery is actually quite bright."

Most of the issues between the company and competition regulators in Brussels were settled at the end of 2008 but Microsoft has continued to pursue an outstanding appeal to one of the European Union's top courts over the right of the Commission to impose certain penalties during the lengthy legal struggle.

The Commission fined Microsoft ($1.2bn) for non-compliance with its original decision, several years earlier, that the company had breached EU anti-trust rules and abused a dominant market position in PC computer operating system.

Intel joins shift to China as executive takes Beijing brief

By Kathryn Williams in Beijing and David Jones in Hong Kong

Intel is moving Sean Maloney, one of its most senior executives, to Beijing as chairman of its China operations, reflecting the rise of China as one of the world's most important markets for multinationals.

King of other senior manufacturing executives. Observers say multinationals increasingly view China as a market so crucial that they are sending their top executives gain a direct and thorough understanding of it, and build personal relationships in the market.

"Companies are looking at China as a second home market," said Joseph Ngai at McKinsey in Hong Kong. This recent building relationships with government and regulators, just as they would in their home markets, is a key trend. In December, Caterpillar, the world's biggest maker of earthmoving equipment by revenue, moved group president Rich Levin from the US to Hong Kong - the first time the company put a member of its executive office in Asia.

In January John Nix, a vice-chairman at General Electric, was appointed to head the company's global operations - all business outside the US - from Hong Kong. He had been based in GE's US headquarters. Ford Motor was an earlier mover, shifting its regional headquarters for Asia Pacific and Africa from Bangalore to Shanghai in 2009, locating functional executives for the region for manufacturing, product development, purchasing and PR in China for the first time.

Analysts said there were strong logistical reasons for moving senior executives close to the Chinese market. "Face-to-face meetings are very important," Mr Nix said. "It's not just about the numbers. It's about the relationship."

Microsoft launches handset software upgrade

By Paul Taylor in New York

Microsoft launched a new version of its Windows Phone 7 smartphone operating system in New York on Tuesday, announcing that it would power the first of a new generation of Nokia handsets due to launch late this year.

The two technology companies in April finished a deal to team up in the smartphone market as they try to fight back against the dominance of devices such as Apple's iPhone and those running on Google's Android.

Andy Lees, president of Microsoft's Mobile Communications Business, demonstrated a preview of the next version of Windows Phone software, codenamed "Mango", which he said would be available for free to Windows Phone 7 users this autumn and described as a major upgrade, launching the next chapter in Microsoft's mobile phone ambitions.

Microsoft launched the Phone 7 operating system seven months ago in an attempt to catch up with features found on the iPhone and Android-powered smartphones. But while Phone 7 has been well-received by reviewers, it has made little headway in the market, in part because of the limited number of handsets on which it is available.

Microsoft has not disclosed how many Phone 7 handsets have been sold since its launch, but Gartner, the research group, estimates that about 1.5m Phone 7 smartphones were shipped in the first quarter. Microsoft's share of the middle price market in the first quarter was just 1.8 per cent, compared with 10 per cent for Android-powered handsets.

Phone 7 handsets are currently available in the UK, including the HTC and Dell. Mr Lees said the Mango upgrade to Phone 7 would also be available on handsets from Acer, ZTE and Fujitsu. Mr Lees said the partnership with Nokia was proceeding well.

Microsoft on Tuesday began an appeal against the European Commission in what looks set to be the final battle in the antitrust battle in Europe which has threatened the group for more than a decade, writes Nikita Tallu in Brussels.
